Testing Sentinel-2's Solar Wings

Once in space, Sentinel-2A will open its solar wing to generate the power it needs to carry out the task of monitoring Earth's vegetation. Engineers have recently made sure this move is well rehearsed before the satellite is packed up and shipped to the launch site.

This final deployment test marks the end of a six-month programme to make sure the satellite can withstand the shocks and vibrations during liftoff and that it is fit for a long working life in the harsh environment of space.

Sentinel-2A will be launched on a Vega Rocket from French Guiana on 11 June 03:52 (CEST).
